Rebuttal Expert Report of Lindsay Orchowski, Ph.D.

I. Background and Qualifications

I am a Staff Psychologist in the Adult Outpatient Division at Rhode Island Hospital (Department of Psychiatry and Behavioral Health, Brown University Health) and a Professor (Research Scholar) at the Warren Alpert Medical School of Brown University. I am a licensed clinical psychologist and researcher with a specific focus on advancing the development and evaluation of sexual assault prevention programs, implementation and dissemination of science, and engaging individuals in proactive helping behavior to prevent injury and harm in their community. My research has been funded by the National Institute of Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA), the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the Department of Defense (DoD), and the Department of Education (ED).

I received my Bachelor of Arts in Psychology and Women's Studies from Dartmouth College in 2003. I completed my Master of Science in Clinical Psychology and Ph.D. in Clinical Psychology at Ohio University's Laboratory for the Study of Prevention of Sexual Assault in 2006 and 2009, respectively. Following my Ph.D., I completed an internship and two fellowships in clinical psychology at Brown University, where I now practice, teach, mentor, and conduct research focused on preventing sexual assault. Additionally, I serve on multiple advisory boards focused on sexual assault prevention. This includes serving as a grant reviewer for the National Institutes of Health, National Institute of Justice, and Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. I was also appointed to the Defense Advisory Committee for the Prevention of Sexual Misconduct, which was established in 2020 to provide independent advice and recommendations on the prevention of sexual assault and other sexual misconduct involving members of the Armed Forces. This Committee also provided independent advice and recommendations on the sexual assault prevention policies, programs, and practices of each Military Department, each Armed Force, each Military Service Academy, and the Coast Guard Academy. I served as Co-Chair of this committee in 2024. My prior work has also focused on campus climate surveys, including membership in the American Association of Universities (AAU) Sexual Assault Campus Climate Survey design team. In 2020, I was recognized as a Doctor of Distinction by the Rhode Island Senate and House of Representatives.

I serve as Associate Editor for Psychology of Women Quarterly and Senior Consulting Editor for Psychology of Violence. I serve as Co-Editor for Journal of Child Sexual Abuse: Research, Treatment & Program Innovations for Sexual Victimization Across the Lifespan. I co-edited Sexual Assault Risk Reduction and Resistance: Theory, Research, and Practice (2018) and Engaging Boys and Men in Sexual Assault Prevention (2022). Additionally, I serve as a reviewer for more than 75 peer-reviewed scientific journals. I have published extensively on topics addressing sexual violence and related harms, including over 235 publications in peer-reviewed scientific journals, book chapters, and reports. I am a member of the Sexual Experiences Survey revision team, led by seminar sexual assault researcher Dr. Mary Koss. This scale is recognized as the gold standard measurement tool for sexual aggression and sexual victimization assessment among adults.

My scientific research focuses on the context of sexual violence, risk and protective factors for sexual violence, consequences of sexual violence, and prevention and response to sexual violence. This work includes research focused on victims, perpetrators as well as bystanders to assault. My article, “Preventing sexual aggression among college men: An evaluation of a social norms and bystander intervention program,” published in Violence Against Women (Gidycz et al. (2011) has been cited by other authors over 700 times. Overall, my research has been cited over 7,400 times.

I also teach two graduate-level classes at Rhode Island College as a visiting instructor. One class is focused on research methodology, and the second class is focused on psychological testing. Specifically, CEP 534 Quantitative Measurement and Test Interpretation focuses on techniques for the effective use of test/assessment results, including statistical and data analysis techniques, psychometric properties of tests, testing in industrial and business settings, as well as issues of test bias and appropriate use of assessments and tests. My CV, attached as Exhibit A, contains a complete list of my publications and qualifications.

I am compensated at $500 per hour for work on this matter. My compensation is not contingent on my opinions or the outcome of this case. I have not served as a testifying expert within the past four years. I have prepared this report as an independent contractor, and the perspectives presented in this report are my own, and do not represent the official position of my employer.

II. Assignment and Methodology

I was retained by counsel for Defendants to review and respond to Dr. Veronique Valliere’s opinions regarding the Uber rideshare platform’s driver sign-up and screening process, environmental safeguards and risk-reduction measures, and the sufficiency of its sexual-misconduct taxonomy. I was also asked to evaluate whether Dr. Valliere’s opinions are supported by sufficient research. As a prevention scientist with extensive research experience in sexual violence prevention and response, I am especially well-qualified for this assignment. I evaluated Dr. Valliere’s opinions using the same methods I employ in my academic work—by considering the arguments and sources in light of the empirical research and my knowledge and experience after over 20 years of relevant research and experience relating to sexual violence prevention and response. This methodology aims to objectively present research evidence by citing published sources, prioritizing discussion of research with the highest standards of evidence (i.e., peer-reviewed publications, rigorous syntheses of the research literature, randomized clinical trials, triangulation of studies which point to a robust pattern of findings rather than an artifact of a single study). For example, meta-analyses and other research syntheses are recognized as highest level of evidence-based decision making in behavioral health and science (Burns et al., 2011) and are prioritized in this report to offer the most rigorous scientific evidence on the matter. All of the opinions I offer in this report are held to a reasonable degree of psychological certainty. A list of the materials I considered is attached to my report as Exhibit B.

III. Summary of Opinions

- Despite desire to identify individuals at risk for committing sexual assault, research has yet to identify systems that can accurately predict whether an individual without a criminal history of committing sexual offenses will commit sexual assault in the future.

- The risk assessment tools that have been developed to assess proclivity of violence do not apply to the general population, and instead are for use in higher risk samples, such as for post-conviction use or use within psychiatric inpatient settings. These measures also have questionable accuracy. Currently, we lack reliable and validated tools or methods that can reliably predict future sexual offending in undetected populations, and many men with a history of sexual aggression will not re-offend.
- Developing such a tool is extraordinarily difficult for many reasons. Rare events are difficult to predict, and as a result, screening for sexual violence risk in a general population is ethically and scientifically limited, with potential for high false positives. There is also no single factor that can predict risk for violence. Even if a moderately reliable screening mechanism could be built, the tool would likely result in a high base rate of false positive cases, given the low base rate of sexual violence perpetration in the general population, which risks bias in the screening process.
- Well-designed systematic reviews have repeatedly found that for adult men, there is no effective strategy for preventing sexual aggression. Currently available evidence does not establish that sexual harassment trainings are effective in preventing occurrence of workplace or on the job harassment.
- Valliere's report lacks rigorous citation to the scientific research data to support her opinions. She improperly makes causal attributions from mere observations rather than relying on robust scientific data to support her opinions. There is considerable heterogeneity in perpetrators of sexual violence (i.e., perpetration against children, intimate partners, acquaintances, etc.) and without reference to the specific studies, samples, contexts, and settings that these claims are based on, the applicability of Valliere's perspectives to the matter at hand cannot be rigorously evaluated. The context of violence in rideshare environments is unique, and the applicability of research in other settings, with other types of perpetration behavior, is unclear. Grounding prevention in scientific evidence is essential, as it allows the best available evidence to guide decisions, rather than generalized assumptions.
- Valliere's report fails to recognize the role of behavioral definitions in lending precision to the description, study, and reporting of types of sexual violence, which are critical for establishing the scope of violence and generating precise prevention practices to respond to it.

IV. Scientific Limitations of Predictive Screening for Sexual Offending

Valliere states that "Uber's research of these risk factors and personality traits is a direct acknowledgement again that something can be done to decrease sexual assault in the high risk-environment." This assertion fails to consider the significant limitations and shortcomings of the research literature regarding the predictive screening for sexual offending (Douglas et al., 2017).

A meta-analysis of risk assessment tools for the prediction of violence suggest that these methods achieve only moderate levels of accuracy (Yang et al., 2010). In fact, a second systematic review and meta-analysis of risk assessments for violence in 73 studies of 24,827 total participants found that most measures have low to moderate positive predictive values, and higher negative predictive values, meaning that they are better at identifying individuals who will not be violent than those who will be (Fazel et al., 2012). In fact, a significant number of individuals who are judged by assessment tools as having a high likelihood for harm are incorrectly classified and do not go on to offend (see Ogonah et al., 2023). Given that false positives are especially high in ethnic minorities, reliance on risk assessments for the determination of violence proclivity can also result in biased decision making, especially for members of protected classes (Shepard, 2016). Notably, few risk assessment tools have been studied in ethnic minority samples (see Shepherd et al., 2016). Taken together, these syntheses of the literature point to a widespread problem relating to the occurrence of “false positives” when risk assessments are used in an attempt to predict risk of violence, and there is a lack of research evidence to support the use of risk assessment tools as determinants of who is likely to harm (Douglas et al., 2017).

Existing measures for evaluating violence proclivity are predominantly studied and implemented among individuals within criminal justice and inpatient psychiatric settings (see Fazel et al., 2023; Singh et al., 2011). The characteristics of criminal justice system samples and psychiatric inpatient samples vary considerably from the general population. As such, there is insufficient basis for assuming that these risk assessments can be applied in new settings or populations (Sontis et al., 2015; Zhou et al., 2016). This is because screening measures are developed and validated for use in a specific population, setting and context. When these measures are transported to a new setting, it assumes that the population, setting and context is similar, which may not be true. When a screening measure is used with a different population, setting or context than it was developed for, the performance of that measure (i.e., its sensitivity, specificity, positive predictive value, negative predictive value) changes (see Altman & Bland, 1994; Monaghan et al., 2021; Shapiro, 1999; Trevethan, 2017; 2023). An assessment may be useful in one setting where the occurrence of a condition is high and then generate a high number of false positives when used in a low prevalence population. This is because different base rates of an occurrence in a population influence the predictive value of a measure. Age-related and context-related differences also influence how an occurrence manifests. Thus, a measure validated to predict violence among individuals within a criminal justice or inpatient psychiatric setting will perform differently in a general adult population, where violence presents differently. In sum, data evaluating the use of risk assessments for these groups is of questionable utility for application for other settings and populations (Douglas et al., 2017).

Detection of risk for violence in a general population with no history of criminal history or psychiatric diagnosis is especially difficult due to low base rates of violence in the general population (Szmukler, 2001). As a result, tools developed for criminal justice and psychiatry inpatient settings perform worse when used in a general population. This is because when a condition is rare (i.e., low base rate), attempting to screen for it is like looking for a needle in a haystack. The likelihood of identifying false positives for low base rate occurrences can be compared to the process of using metal detector on the beach. Even if the instrument is relatively good, the beachgoer will detect far more worthless metal objects (i.e., false positives) before they find a coin/valuable (i.e., true positive). Given that the rate of violence is lower in the general population compared to criminal justice and psychiatric populations, use of assessment tools developed for use in criminal justice and psychiatric inpatient populations will generate significantly more false positives, which can therefore lead to biased decision making (for discussion of the limitations of violence risk assessment see Large & Nielssen, 2017).

As Zimmerman (2022) notes, “when studying a disorder with a relatively low prevalence, it is near impossible for a screening test to have sufficient positive predictive value to be used to validly compare the individuals who do and do not screen positive.” Table 2 shows that when the prevalence of a condition is high (50%), a tool with 90% sensitivity and 90% specificity will correctly identify 90 true positives while also indicating 10 false positives. However, when a condition has 5% prevalence, a tool with the same sensitivity and specificity will correctly identify only 9 true positives while also indicating 19 false positives. Thus, with conditions of low prevalence, tools can generate more false positives than they do true positives, highlighting how the same assessment performs in a fundamentally different manner depending on the commonality of a condition.

Table 2. Hypothetical Tables of Association of a Test With Sensitivity and Specificity of 90% With a Disorder Prevalence Rate of 50% or 5%

A. Disorder Prevalence = 50%

Screening Scale	Gold Standard Diagnosis
	Present	Absent	Total
Positive	90	10	100
Negative	10	90	100
Total	100	100	200

Sensitivity =  $a/(a+c) = 90/100 = 90.0\%$ .

Specificity =  $d/(b+d) = 90/100 = 90.0\%$ .

Positive Predictive Value =  $a/(a+b) = 90/100 = 90.0\%$ .

Negative Predictive Value =  $d/(c+d) = 90/100 = 90.0\%$ .

B. Disorder Prevalence = 5%

Screening Scale	Gold Standard Diagnosis
	Present	Absent	Total
Positive	9	19	28
Negative	1	171	172
Total	10	190	200

Sensitivity =  $a/(a+c) = 9/10 = 90.0\%$ .

Specificity =  $d/(b+d) = 171/190 = 90.0\%$ .

Positive predictive value =  $a/(a+b) = 9/28 = 32.1\%$ .

Negative predictive value =  $d/(c+d) = 171/172 = 99.4\%$ .

Given high rates of false positives when attempting to screen for low base rate occurrences, it is not recommended to make high-stakes decisions based on an unvalidated screening process. The results of an assessment process that is yet to be validated should also be interpreted cautiously, with any positive results considered as “flags for further assessment.” Thus, although there may be pressure to use an existing tool that has been used in a different setting, doing so comes with real risks when the new population and setting that the tool is to be used in differ substantially.

Estimating a job applicant's risk (or independent contractor/gig worker in the instance of this litigation) of engaging in future misconduct above and beyond utilization of a background check is also challenging for a variety of reasons. The Defense Advisory Committee on the Prevention of Sexual Misconduct (DAC-PSM), which I co-chaired, considered the question of the feasibility of screening before entry into military service of recruits who may have been the subject or perpetrator of prior incidents of sexual assault and harassment (see meeting notes of the DAC-PSM, November 14, 2024; https://www.dhra.mil/Portals/52/Documents/DAC-PSM/DAC-PSM\_Presentation\_14\_November\_2024.pdf). The Military Compatibility Research Group (MCRG) examined whether improvements could be made to the Department of Defense's military accession process and conducted a review of the academic literature to assess conceptual predictors of misconduct, which might be utilized to estimate an applicant's risk of engaging in future misconduct, violence, or other problematic behavior. There were no existing assessments that evaluated 17 of the identified potential signals for misconduct, and recommendations pointed to the need to develop a measure specific to the needs and context of the military (Schneider et al., 2012). No single factor can predict risk for violence in general, or sexual violence more specifically. It is also impossible to predict the risk of "imminent" violence (whether self- or other-directed) with 100% specificity and sensitivity.

The multifaceted risk and protective factors that contribute to risk of sexual violence are also well documented. Dr. Andra Teten Tharp and her colleagues conducted a systematic qualitative review that summarized results of 191 published empirical studies examining risk and protective factors for sexual violence perpetration, published in 2013 in the journal Trauma, Violence, & Abuse. Studies in the review examined factors for perpetration by and against adolescents and adults, by male and female perpetrators, and by those who offended against individuals of the same sex or opposite sex. Given that predictors of sexual violence between adults differ from perpetration of sexual violence against children, the factors associated with child sexual abuse perpetration were not included in the review. Factors associated with sexual aggression perpetration were identified across the social ecology, reflecting individual, relational, societal, and community-level factors contributing to sexual violence perpetration risk. In all, 2 societal and community factors, 23 relationship factors, and 42 individual-level factors were identified, for a total of 67 factors identified. Consistent support for associations with sexual violence perpetration were identified for 35 of the 67 factors. These findings suggest that no single factor is indicative of risk for sexual aggression (see also O'Connor et al., 2021). Because no study has examined all 35 of these identified factors in a single population, it is not reasonable to expect that an organization would use these 35 factors (individually or in combination) to develop a system to screen for violence risk. First, the accuracy of a predictive equation also drops when it is utilized in a new sample (see Heyman & Slep, 2001 for an example). As a result, findings documenting risk factors for sexual aggression demonstrated in the studies reviewed by Tharp et al. and O'Connor et al. would warrant replication to explore their relevance to a new population and context. Further, because these correlations between various indicators and violence were identified at the group level, applying risk factors to predict the outcomes of an individual case remains contested (Connors & Large, 2023). The above data also highlight how prevention efforts must be multifaceted, comprehensive, include multiple intervention targets, and be implemented across multiple settings to achieve widespread impact. Given the complex nature of sexual aggression, it is not surprising that currently for adult men, “there is no effective strategy to prevent perpetration” (see Anderson et al., 2023, p. 499; citing reviews by DeGue et al., 2014; Wright et al., 2018).

It is also important to be skeptical of the stereotype that sexual assault is primarily committed by a single high-rate offender group of men. The stereotype that there is a high-rate offender group of men who engage in sexual aggression is linked to a widely discussed cross-sectional study by Lisak and Miller (2002), which used a sample of 120 self-identified offenders (ages 18-71) who were pooled from four studies conducted over seven years at a single university. The study found that among men who reported perpetrating attempted or completed rape, 63% reported multiple rape acts. Findings contributed to the assumption that most acts of sexual aggression were committed by serial perpetrators. Notably, despite both studies being cross-sectional in nature, the data were widely shared and contributed to the assumption that most men who perpetrate sexual assault do so multiple times. The stereotype of the monolithic serial perpetrator was distributed in educational materials by John Foubert and colleagues and contributed to a distorted societal perception that most perpetrators of sexual aggression were sociopathic men who might be easily detected. This assumption masks the heterogeneity of perpetration behavior. More recent and methodologically rigorous longitudinal research suggests a more complex and heterogeneous pattern of sexual violence perpetration than indicated by Lisak and Miller (2002). Specifically, a report from the National Sexual Violence Resource Center (NSVRC), published in 2015, summarizes Swartout and colleagues’ (2015) use of latent class growth modeling to test the serial perpetration hypothesis using two large longitudinal studies ( $n = 847$  and  $n = 795$ ) of college men. Of men who committed college rape, 75% reported perpetration during one year and 25% reported perpetration for two or more years. A small group of men perpetrated sexual aggression prior to college but did not repeat the behavior (5%). An even smaller portion of men did not perpetrate prior to college but did so during their college years (2.1%). Most men in the sample had no history of sexual aggression and did not perpetrate over the course of the study. These findings, and work by others, point to considerable variability in the future behavior of men with a prior history of sexual aggression, many of whom are unlikely to engage in a future assault (see Abbey et al., 2012; Lussier & Davies, 2011; McWorter et al., 2009; Swartout et al., 2015; Thompson et al., 2013; 2015).

Swartout et al.’s (2015) study utilized the Sexual Experiences Survey (see Koss et al., 1987; Koss et al., 2007) surveys engagement in sexual aggression using behaviorally-specific items, which allow for indication of sexual aggression even when the respondent does not acknowledge the criminal nature of the behavior (Koss & Oros, 1982). Behaviorally-specific descriptions of sexual violence are important for a clear assessment of sexual violence, given that most men who perpetrate sexual aggression do not label it as a crime and do not come to the attention of the criminal justice system (Anderson et al., 2023).

In summary, despite desire to identify individuals at potential risk for committing sexual harm, assault, or misconduct, research has yet to develop reliable systems that accurately predict who will and who will not engage in harm. Attempts to implement predictive screening for sexual assault for those without a prior criminal history are unreliable and result in significant false positives. Accordingly, there is insufficient scientific basis grounded in research to support Dr. Valliere’s opinion that Uber “should have” identified potential offenders, like the U.S. military has rigorously explored, beyond conducting the background checks that Uber already conducts on every individual looking to sign up to drive on the Uber platform.

V. Prevention Standards in Taxi and Rideshare Industries

Valliere opines, without scientific support, that “the acts of sexual offenders are often preventable.” Understanding the prevalence of harm in a particular context is a critical starting place for implementing a public health approach to violence prevention. A public health approach is the recommended approach to violence prevention offered by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. However, it is difficult to estimate the prevalence of harm in public transit settings (Gekoski et al., 2022), and there is little research with methodological rigor estimating the prevalence of sexual violence on public transport in North American settings (Stringer, 2007). In Australia, survey research by Whitzman et al. (2019) among 517 students found that 79% of female respondents had experienced sexual harassment on public transport, and 52% of male respondents reported victimization. Another Australian study of sexual assault and harassment at a university setting conducted in 2016 had over 30,000 respondents from 39 universities (Australian Human Rights Commission, 2017) also identified “travelling to or from university” as a common location of sexual assault (15%). Developing a sound prevention approach therefore requires accurate data to understand the scope of the problem in specific U.S. public transport settings, as well as identification of risk and protective factors. Without this grounding information, a prevention approach is unlikely to be tailored to the specific context in which specific forms of sexual violence occurs. Tillewin and Cox (2024) highlight the need for research to guide prevention practice specific to rideshare risk.

Sexual assault prevention programs for men are underdeveloped in comparison to other approaches (DeGue et al., 2014) and show limited effects in reducing rates of sexual aggression over long-term follow-up periods (Wright et al., 2020). Most programs are specific to college contexts, and not workplace settings for adult men more broadly. In fact, there is little evidence regarding what programs and policies are effective in creating an organizational climate that reduces sexual harassment (Diez-Canseco et al. 2022). Some workplaces implement sexual harassment trainings, but research suggests that these trainings have limited effectiveness in preventing actual occurrences of harm (e.g., Cronin et al., 2024). Medeiros and Griffith (2019) discuss that there is little evidence that attitude change resulting from harassment training programs is maintained over time. Johnson et al. (2018) note that there is little evidence that harassment training has a positive effect on attitudes and highlight potential negative effects. Roehling and Huang’s (2018) qualitative review also documents mixed results of harassment training outcomes. A review by Roehling et al., (2022) found that workplace harassment training may increase knowledge, but the impact of training on reducing rates of harassment following the training is unclear.

Given that the lack of available evidence-based prevention programs that reliably demonstrate an objective reduction in rates of harassment or sexual assault among men, following a public health approach to prevention practice can provide an organization with a context-specific strategy for addressing violence risk. Uber’s steps to document, describe, and assess risk factors for risk of violence align with the public health framework for violence prevention. These efforts represent an important step in building the evidence base necessary to inform and then guide prevention decisions tailored to this unique context.

More specifically, the public health approach to prevention of sexual violence is emphasized in technical packages and publications of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and provide a systematic four-step approach to prevention of violence. These four steps include: 1) Define and monitor the problem; 2) Identify risk and protective factors; 3) Develop and Test Prevention Strategies; and 4) Ensure widespread adoption. Step 1 focuses on using data to understand the scope, characteristics, and consequences of violence. Data can include surveillance systems, surveys, or police reports, with the goal of garnering a clear picture of what's happening in a particular setting, not just what is assumed to be happening based on data from other environments or organizations. Step 2 focuses on developing a context-specific understanding of why violence occurs and what can be done to prevent it. Core questions include understanding what factors increase risk, and what factors protect against it. The goal of this inquiry is to move beyond anecdotes and stereotypes, to understand specific factors in given settings that contribute to the occurrence of harm. Step 3 focuses on using the data garnered in Step 1 and Step 2 to develop or adapt interventions based on the risk/protective factors identified, and then rigorously evaluate whether these programs and practices work to reduce rates of violence. Step 4 focuses on the dissemination of effective programs and policies at scale including the provision of training and technical assistance to ensure that programs are delivered with fidelity. Uber provides evidence of moving along this public health prevention framework pathway in its data collection and typology efforts.

Of note, whereas some college campuses implement sexual assault prevention approaches for their campus (Step 4), they do so without implementing Steps 1-3 (i.e., defining the problem on their campus, identifying their particular risk factors, identifying programs that are ideal for their environment). Focusing only on addressing prevention activity without defining the problem, understanding its scope and risk factors is not evidence-based practice. This same problem manifests in Valliere's report, given its focus on broad concepts relating to sexual assault, rather than the specific context of the matter at hand.

The CDC's public health approach to sexual violence prevention can be utilized by organizations seeking to develop violence prevention approaches. For instance, the work of the Defense Advisory Committee for the Prevention of Sexual Conduct is an example of how the U.S. military was generating its own data to describe the unique context of sexual violence in each branch of the service and working to identify specific risk and protective factors specific to the military context, so that this information could be utilized to inform prevention practices. In unique contexts, where data and programs from other settings (such as college campuses) cannot be readily generalized or applied to other unique contexts, such as rideshare platforms. Generating context-specific data, in addition to risk and protective factors, provides the foundation for a context-specific public health prevention approach. Based on my experience, and the materials reviewed, the steps taken by Uber are consistent with the CDC's public health approach for developing a sexual violence prevention approach. Uber shows evidence of work to identify risk factors for violence with the goal of preventing harm and enhancing public safety, which are reasonable and recommended steps for an organization to implement.

VI. Valliere Makes Assertions and Conclusions that Lack Scientific Foundation and Contextual Relevance

Valliere's report includes broad statements regarding perpetration of sexual violence and its prevention without reference to research supporting their effectiveness in this setting, or without reference to whether they were specific to perpetrators of child vs. adult sexual violence. Whereas clinical observation may be useful for working one-on-one with victims and offenders in treatment settings, clinical opinion is not equivalent to empirical evidence. Expert conclusions in risk assessment should be supported by peer-reviewed data, not anecdotal experience. Other assertions, such as statements that Uber's policies "embolden offenders," are speculative, unsupported by empirical evidence, and propose a causal mechanism that cannot be scientifically tested or verified.

In circumstances where Valliere alludes to theory or research, it is unclear which studies are being referred to, or whether these studies are even relevant to the types of assaults which occur in the context of rideshares. Without this clarification, there is risk that the sample, context, setting, or time in history does not apply to the current context at hand. If theory or research has meaningful differences from the rideshare context (e.g., grooming as described in research of perpetrators of child sexual abuse), it may be irrelevant to the current matter.

An example is Valliere's discussion of the underreporting rates of sexual assault in the population-base literature on sexual assault, which are discussed with relevance to Uber incident data. Reporting dynamics vary by setting, and Uber's anonymous reporting mechanisms, lack of any requirement that the rider report to law enforcement in the first instance, and rider demographics make such extrapolation of population-level sexual assault data ungeneralizable to this context. Such broad generalizations throughout her report, without consistent reference and citation to relevant scientific literature, make it impossible to ascertain whether the information discussed in the report is of relevance to the current context.

Citation of the research is essential for several reasons. It allows others to verify the claims and ensures that an individual is not misrepresenting or overgeneralizing the literature. Citation also ensures that there is context-specific relevant evidence to back up a claim. Grounding claims in reference to specific research studies is also the bedrock of sound evidence-based practice in medicine, public health, and prevention science and allows others to determine the quality and limits of the claims being stated. Knowing the research that is being referenced to support a claim also allows a reader to evaluate the strength of evidence for a claim. Not all published research is equally strong, and not all studies include samples or settings that are applicable to answer specific questions, for specific groups and settings (Burns et al., 2011). For example, different research methodologies also lend varying levels of evidence for decision making, with systematic reviews and meta-analysis considered the highest quality of evidence for decision making, weighted above case studies or studies of single samples. Linking a statement to well-established research also enhances the trustworthiness and credibility of a claim, showing that a perspective is backed by established research, and is not merely one's own opinions. Without citation of research, Valliere's report raises the question of whether the sources that form the opinions presented can be verified or can sufficiently address the nuances and complexity of this unique matter.

VII. Valliere's Criticism of Uber's Terminology Misunderstands Accepted Research Standards for Use of Behavioral Descriptions of Sexual Violence

Sexual violence can mean different things to different people (Anderson et al., 2023). As a result, in sexual violence research, terms describing behavior (e.g., “non-consensual sexual penetration”) are preferred over legal or emotionally charged terms like “rape” (Koss et al., 2007). Use of these precise operational definitions, which are behaviorally specific, is preferred in sexual assault prevention research, because it promotes consistent description of experiences, aids in accurate data collection, and fosters reduced ambiguity in surveys and reports (Krebs, 2014). This is why researchers use terms such as “non-consensual touching” instead of terms like sexual assault. The use of neutral, descriptive language improves reporting reliability, mitigates stigma, and aids prevention research. Review of Uber’s taxonomy, developed with the National Sexual Violence Resource Center, reflects these best practices in sexual violence research and aligns with terminology utilized both by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention as well as National Institutes of Justice (Sniffen, 2018). Valliere’s criticism that Uber’s terminology “camouflages” criminality misunderstands the distinction between behavioral classification and legal adjudication. She provides no compelling research to support her opinions on this issue. Such a preference for legally loaded terminology risks conflating moral rhetoric with empirical reporting standards, which are meant to foster precision and specificity within the field. Behavioral definitions and terms focus on what happened, rather than a label placed on the experience, and are consistent with best practice in sexual violence research.

VIII. Valliere Overstates Organizational Causation and “Constructed Opportunity”

Valliere’s report claims that Uber “constructed” an environment which caused sexual violence to occur. But this claim rests on a logical fallacy—in essence, that whenever misconduct occurs on the Uber platform, it must somehow have been caused by conditions created by Uber. “Storks Deliver Babies ( $p=0.0008$ )” is a popular reading assignment for undergraduate research methods classes across. In Robert Matthew’s article, published KIRKLAND & ELLIS INTERNATIONAL LLP Teaching Statistics in 2000, data from 17 European countries in 1990 is analyzed, demonstrating a statistically significant correlation of 0.62 between the number of storks and the number of births. If students interpret this correlation to infer causation, they might make the erroneous conclusion that storks deliver babies. However, if students look at the data carefully, they see there are multiple confounders in the study design that negate the assumption that storks contribute to the number of babies simply because there are more storks in towns where there are more babies. Another common example to illustrate this point is that ice cream sales and violent crime rates show positive correlations, but there is no causation.

The causal fallacy is relevant to several of Valliere’s claims in which repeatedly infer a causal connection between circumstances in the absence of causal evidence. For example, Valliere describes environmental circumstances to be “constructed by Uber,” a claim which is abstraction rather than evidence of causation. Like many other environments, rideshares may allow for proximity between individuals; however, the occurrence of proximity between two people does not “cause” sexual violence to occur. Like bars, elevators, and medical exam rooms, rideshare environments create proximity between two individuals, but none of these environments “cause” or “produce” sexual aggression. Individuals who engage in sexual aggression are responsible for their actions, regardless of whether they are in a bar, riding an elevator, giving a physical exam, or operating a vehicle. A scientifically guided approach to sexual violence research and prevention practice must be critical of claims suggestive of causal fallacy. Causal claims are valid only generated through a research methodology that is appropriate for generating causal evidence.

I reserve the right to supplement my report as new material becomes available to me.
